The men tried to escape and the fight began. Mosby is a wiry chap, but was getting the worst of it when he drew his revolver and ordered their hands up. The smaller of the two went through the window like a fiash, followed by a ball which Mosby thinks struck him. The moment he turned the other started off also. Wheeling about, Mosby halted him, compelled him to hold out both hands, alipped on the handcuffs and took him to headquarters.

The bag he carried contained several thousand in good money. The men had no counterfeit money.

LUCKILY BLUEJACKETS WERE Is the best in Ale is to ON THE COMMONWEALTH.

With Their Help All on the Little Steam-ship Volund Were Saved—Three Great Boats, Summoned Through the Fog by

The Fall River liner Commonwealth, 456 feet long, giantess of the Sound fleet and the finest and costliest steel hulled sidewheeler in commission, got in yesterday from Newport with the skipper, Capt. Schjott, his wife, Ingbor, and the crew of the little Norwegian tramp steamship Volund, a steel boat of 970 tons, which the liner rammed and sank at the eastern entrance of the Sound, near Race Rock, in a thick fog early in the morning The Commonwealth had aboard fortyeight Yankee bluejackets and several petty officers bound from the gunnery school at Newport to Washington, and their coolness and the experience of long and constant training was a mighty help to the men of the liner who got out some of the lifeboats and picked up some of the Volund's crew. The others from the Volund clambered aboard at the moment of collision, and the wife of the Volund's captain was handed aboard. The Commonwealth was not much damaged except about the wooden superstructure at the bow, and she was able to return to Fall River on her regular trip last night. The Commonwealth had about 700 pas-engers, and most of them were asleep when she started to negotiate the Race in one of the densest fogs that ever bothered navigators on the Sound. A large part of the bluejackets, who were traveling second class, had not turned in. Capt. Williamson, commodore of the Fall River fleet, was at the helm The liner was making about thirteen knots, and according to passengers her searchlight was

At about 1:25 c'clock the blur of a vessel showed on the starboard bow of the Commonwealth. She slowed down and her engines were sent backing at full speed. The little tramp, eastbound, materialized from the mist so swiftly that the Common-wealth still had headway on when the two came together. The tough steel prow of the liner went through the por bow plates of the Volund as if they had

This wrought up the women passengers and some of them began to cry. At last a bost was going waterward, manned by men of the Commonwealth. The falls got tangled and just as the boat was passing the deck on which Charles Weber, naval quartermaster and veteran of the service, and Chief Master at Arms Willism Brown were waiting for it they jumped in and straightened out things, lowering the post on an even keel.

Two other boats followed, one of which was maked by three bluelackets and two stewards and the other entirely by was magned by three blue ackets and two stewards and the other entirely by the experts of Uncle Sam.

It seemed nearly an hour to the watchers and listeners aboard the Commonwealth before the boats got back out of the fog. At no time did any of the passengers get a glimpse of the Volund except in the few moments that she was spitted on the Commonwealth's bow or grinding alongside. The searchlight was put into play about twenty minutes after the collision, but could not pick out the wreck, which was about 500 yards off the liner's starboard bow. It took some time for the first boat to find the Volund. Her bow was then completely under water and her stern was tilted away up in the air almost at an angle of 45 degrees. Her skipper and en men had been unable to leave her as her boats had been smashed or carried away. All hands were taken aboard the first lifeboat and rowed back to the ship. A few minutes after they left the wreck it reared and plunged bow first into the depths, a muffied roar indicating that her boilers had gone to pieces. The women passengers who had been so stirred when the voices ceased calling out of the mist unclasped their hands and gave a sigh when the boat came alongside and word was passed that all hands had been saved. Pent up anxiety broke forth in a mighty shout from the men and a burst of feminine cheers and handelapping.

According to passengers, it was about one hour and ten minutes after the collision that the Commonwealth proceeded. Most of the passengers interviewed highly praised the efficiency of the blue jackets. Capt. Schjott said that when he was hit by the Commonwealth he was making praised the efficiency of the blue jackets.

Capt. Schjott said that when he was hit by the Common wealth he was making about three knots, just groping along, and that the liner seemed to be going about thirteen and fourteen knots. "After I helped my wife to a sailor of the navy who stood in the bow of the Commonwealth," the skipper said, "I decided to return to my cabin for the ship's papers and look after the crew that had not got aboard the steamer. I did not hear her siren. I kept my own fog whistle going."

New London, Sept. 26.—The collision of the Commonwealth and the Volund means that another big investigation is to be conducted in New London by the United States inspectors of steam vessels. This board is made up of Capt. William E. Withey and John Stewart, who made an exhaustive investigation of the Larchmont-Knowles collision. The officers of the Commonwealth and as many of the crew as the inspectors desire to examine will be summoned before the inspectors and the officers of the Volund will have an opportunity to make statements.

dinner the other day to the whole Diplo-matic Corps, but they did not invite the Bulgarian "diplomatic agent" because technically Bulgaria is still a Turkish province. The Bulgarian Government interpreted the omission as a grave slight and withdrew him from Constantinople.

There was a strike which lasted a few days on the Oriental Railway, which passe: through Bulgaria, but which is owned by Turkey and leased to the Oriental Railway Company. The Bulgarian authorities put troops to work in place of the strikers on their section of the line. The strike was soon over. The operating company first and then the Turkish Government called upon Bulgaria to remove the troops and allow the line to be operated in the ordinary way. Bulgaria has refused to surrender possession of the line and announces her intention of buying the line from the operating company.

This action constitutes a violation of the famous treaty of Berlin, and Turkey has solemnly called upon Europe to take action. The great Powers expect at any moment to receive from Sofia a declara heaven knows wha: will happen then.

All this terrible state of affairs, bear inmind, is a direct consequence of that finner party a fortnight ago to which M. Gueshoff, the Bulgarian agent, did not receive an invitation. The squabble is all the more farcical in view of the fact that it involves no practical issue what-ever. Bulgaria ha been independent her own treaties with foreign Powers. Prince Ferdinand is treated everywhere as a titular sovereign, as witness his reception at Budapest this week by the Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria. But he wants to change his title of Prince to King, and the country's diplomatic representatives want to be known as ninisters instead of agents.

The new rulers of Turkey, on the othe hand, are one in the determination to abandon no claim of Turkish sovereignty. however shadowy it may be. It is now known that they hastened the execution of their revolutionary plans by several months not on account of any do mestic urgency but because they feared the Anglo-Russian scheme of Macedonian reforms might imperil Turkish sover-eignty in that unhappy province. They are, in fact, more patriotic than the Sultan, and more jeolous of the integrity of the Ottoman empire, so there is a deadlock with only that muddling entity known as the concert of Europe available to prevent war.
Austria, it is well known, would be glad to welcome the independence of Bulgaria as a fait accompli, but she is trying to maintain the correct attitude of refusing to approve Bulgaria's illegal action in regard to the railway Germany will probably support Austria. Russis opposes Prince Ferdinand's ambition, while England and France will do their utmost to preserve peace. Moreover, the commercial interests of the population of Bulgaria interests of the population of Bulgaria meet with very little respect from the Eastern Railway.
